What to do

Your conference reflection

You have presented your research in public. This milestone turns that afternoon into a reflection on the conference and the audience you had, and a plan to improve your research and to complete what remains. You do it in the two asynchronous sessions that follow the conference, online and in place of class. Bring your Expo notes to both.

Part 1: the Conference Reflection Survey (first session)

Answer the survey (link on Brightspace) from your Expo notes: what you learned at the conference beyond your own poster; how many people stopped and who they were; the questions you were asked, which came up more than once, and whether each aimed at your communication or your claims; the hardest question; and one thing you did well and one you would do differently.

Part 2: your plan for the research (second session)

One to two pages, in your PDF:

1. What your audience taught you: a paragraph built from the questions you were asked, naming the one that matters most for the research.
2. The plan: a table with one row per piece of remaining work (analyses, checks, data, revisions, results not yet reported), each with why it matters, what it needs, what it could change, and its order and a realistic target of your own. Order the rows by what most affects your claim.
3. Optional: whether you would like to redo your poster and present an update at an honors symposium by the end of the semester, if the budget to print a new poster is available, and what would be new on it.

End with your AI Research Ledger rows.

How it is graded

A 100-point rubric: the survey 20, the reflection on the conference and the audience 25, the plan 40, and craft and ledger 15. The optional updated-poster section is not scored.
